You don't have to grow kudzu, you just have to wait until it gets to you!

My dad in law had bought a property overgrown with kudzu. He found that trimming the growth did nothing to stop it. Then he learned to follow it to its roots. He described the root to be similar to a large carrot, just not orange. He dug up the roots and disposed them. The overgrowth disapeared within a years time. He was a brilliant man who's missed to this day.

Back in the late 70s, I was employed to remove kudzu from the side of the road. It filled a gully that was 20 ft deep, we found 3 cars buried in it

Planting instructions on kudzu seeds:
1. Throw as hard as you can.
2. Run as fast as you can.

My buddies father in Connecticut we used to have a patch of rosehip plants growing right next to General Dynamics in Groton Connecticut and we used to go pick the berries with him and then he take them home and make jam out of it and give it to all the Neighbors in the project as long as he got his canning jars back

FYI you can legally grow poppies. You can even collect the pods and make tincture or poppy tea with them for pain etc. There is no issue with it as it is. What becomes illegal is when you start collecting the milk latex and altering that...as that's opium. But by itself, it's not illegal. I have a friend who is a cop and went rounds asking him questions on that one. It's great to have poppies for poppy seeds.. the home grown poppy seeds are sweet for use in baking. The conventionally grown are bitter and gross. People still grow them all over the US for home use.
